If you can let go of passion, and
follow your curiosity, your curiosity might just lead you to your passion.

- Elizabeth Gilbert -

Tools for Trust

Trust is invisible, yet it's the foundation of lasting relationships. This exercise will help to make the invisible visible.

Spread the deck, image side up. Invite each person to choose one image they feel represents a crucial ingredient for building a relationship of trust.

Now have people pair up (or form a small group) and share how the image they chose represents trust.

You might also invite people to share a story about a time when a team member exemplified that element of trust.

Forging a Future

Spread the deck out, quote side up, before a meeting begins. As people enter, ask them to choose a quote that speaks to a future they would like to create. When you are ready to start, ask each person to share their name and how the quote connects to their intended future.

For example: "I'm Rory and I chose the quote 'Done is better than perfect' because I'd like to see more action and less fear of failure in our organization."

You could also strategically prop this card up as directions, so that people can engage as soon as they enter the space (an "unofficial start," if you like).

Quick Quotes

Invite each person to choose a card and silently read the quote it contains. Keep or swap cards with others until everyone feels that the quote on their card represents a personal core value or belief. Swap at least 3 times.

Create “connection before content” and set a positive tone for the meeting by inviting each person to briefly state their name and read aloud the quote they’ve kept.

Consider inviting people to keep their card and to put it on their “keyboard, dashboard or cork board” as a reminder of who they aspire to be in the world.

Inspiring Intentions

Form small groups (3-5 people) and spend 15-30 minutes discussing and reaching consensus on a single card that best represents each group's intention for the day, taking both the quote and photo sides of the card into account.

After each group has decided on a card and intention, have them share with the larger group the card they selected and why they chose it.

Often times we have intentions that affect others. Yet very rarely do we share those intentions. There is immense power in getting clear about your intention and sharing it. It allows groups to connect with and agree to the "game" they are playing.
